

The Original Three Hundred

30

by Peter M. German, D/Comm'r. (ret'd.)¹

In 1874, a contingent of police on horseback headed west from Manitoba through uncharted land, intent on bringing law and order to the Canadian prairie. Resplendent in their scarlet tunics, these men literally rode into history. The question that many have asked but few have satisfactorily answered, is how this band of 300 evolved into a national police force, of international renown.

It was the vision of Canada's first Prime Minister, the brilliant but very human John A. Macdonald, that there should be a unit of soldier police, who could accomplish certain of his goals for the fledgling nation. Having recently experienced the Fenian raids, Macdonald was determined to resist political and military incursions from Canada's neighbour to the south. He also wished to open the West to European settlement and allow a railway to be constructed, completing a promise made to entice British Columbia into Confederation. He wanted to accomplish these goals without the Indian Wars which were ongoing in the United States. Reports of depredations committed by American whiskey and fur traders in what is now southern Alberta, spurred action and allowed his plan to come to fruition.²

The challenge for Macdonald was to find a policing model that worked in the wilderness. Not surprisingly, he turned to the British policing system, which had developed in two parallel tracts – a civil police, based upon the model of Sir Robert Peel, for policing within England; and a cavalry police, based loosely on the Royal Irish Constabulary and the gendarmerie of Europe, for policing the far-flung colonies of the British Empire. The concept of a cavalry police, or mounted rifles appealed to Macdonald.

Royal Assent for enabling legislation creating the North West Mounted Police, was obtained on May 23, 1873.³ Although little progress toward establishing the Force was evident during the summer, on September 25th the first officers, many with strong political connections, were sworn in and immediately dispatched to the provinces. Their task was to select three troops of 50 men from the many hundreds who applied. Section 13 of the statute defined the criteria for those joining the Force:

> "No person shall be appointed to the Police Force unless he be of a sound constitution, able to ride, active and able bodied, of good character, and between the ages of eighteen and forty years."

The recruits were a cross-section of the Canadian mosaic of the day; including English and French speaking men, professionals and labourers, educated and self-taught, the politically connected and others not. In addition, recruits from seven other countries were included in the ranks. They all had traits in common; a desire for adventure in one of the largest, unsettled tracts of land in the world, and the promise of a land grant of 160 acres after three years of service. Few had police training, although a number were members of the British regular forces garrisoned in Canada or of the Canadian militia (reserve) forces. Many had travelled, and some had fought in foreign lands under Her Majesty's flag.⁵

Most recruits were engaged as subconstables, at the princely sum of 75 cents per day, while non-commissioned officers were appointed as chief constables, constables, and acting constables, at a marginally higher rate of pay. The youngest, Fred Bagley, was fifteen years old and served as a trumpeter

The original 150 police officers were dispatched to Lower Fort Garry, Manitoba via an overland route through Northern Ontario, reporting on arrival to the Force's Temporary Commissioner, Lieutenant Colonel Osborne Smith. On October 18th, Macdonald obtained the secondment of Lieutenant Colonel George A.

member of the militia and was known for his physical strength, and strength of character, an unflinching loyalty to the flag, and a drill instructor's talent for getting the best out of his charges.

The Force's challenge was to somehow navigate the vast expanse of the Prairies. To do so called for a potpourri of talent; including those who could hew wood, grow crops, hunt game, drive animals, cook by campfire, maintain records, care for the injured and sick, treat horses, and perform any number of other tasks. The assembled multitude had most, but not all of the necessary skill sets. Included were butchers, saddlers, blacksmiths, surveyors, a gardener, a jeweller, a druggist, an architect, a cabinet maker, a law clerk, sailors, and soldiers. Missing from the ranks were scouts with local knowledge of the land. To fill that gap, the French of the Royal Artillery, stationed at Kingston, Ontario, as the first permanent Commissioner. Recruiting continued in the East for an additional 150 men, who assembled in Toronto and brought the Force to its complement of 300. The second wave drilled during the Spring of 1874 and departed to join their comrades on June 6th. They rendezvoused two weeks later in Manitoba. To his great dismay, Colonel French discovered that many of the recruits, particularly from the first wave, could either not ride or rode poorly, and others suffered from a variety of disabilities.

The task of turning this eclectic group into a disciplined unit fell to a cadre of instructors, some of whom would distinguish themselves in the years ahead. The most prominent was Sam Steele, a name which became inseparable with the Force and the birth of modern Western Canada. Steele had been a Commissioner turned to First Nations and Metis trackers, the most famous being Jerry Potts.

The March West, which began with a brilliant exit from Fort Dufferin on July 8, 1874, has been described as the Great March West. It was great in terms of adventure, yet hardly heroic in terms of its planning and execution.⁷ Commissioner French did not follow the route blazed earlier by the Boundary Commission along the 49th Parallel. Instead he set forth on a course across the arid prairie, where the police encountered virtually everything that Mother Nature could thrust upon them; including wind, rain, hail, electric storms, scorching heat, vermin and varmints, a paucity of food and water, and a supply chain which consisted of a trail of slow moving oxen extending back for 10 miles farther than the eye could see.

⁷A modern and very readable account is that of David Cruise and Alison Griffiths, The Great Adventure – How the Mounties Conquered the West (Toronto: Viking, 1996).

⁴Among the 300 were 41 former British Army soldiers; 14 former police officers, including from the Royal Irish Constabulary; 32 soldiers from the Canadian Artillery; and 87 reservists from the Canadian Militia. Prominent among these was Joseph Francis, a veteran of the Crimean War, believed to have been a survivor of the Charge of the Light Brigade.

⁶Archives Canada maintains the files of many of the original members of the Force and has made most available online.

The long line of men, horses, and carts often appeared more akin to a lost colony in search of providence than a harbinger of law and order. That they survived the trek is testament to their strength of character, and a fair bit of luck. French himself returned east before completing the March and set up his headquarters in Manitoba, leaving his deputy, James Macleod to reach the goal of Fort Whoop-up, south of present-day Calgary.⁸

Although referred to as a police force, in reality the NWMP's primary task was to be a visible presence of the Queen's authority, accomplished in large part by their scarlet uniforms. In addition to routine policing duties, they acted as a quasi-militia, and as a benevolent, yet authoritarian presence among the First Nations peoples. The Force built a number of forts throughout the prairies and got down to work.

A small number of the 'Originals' remained with the Force and made it their chosen career, Steele being a prime example. Others re-enlisted for one or more years, while some were quick to depart after their original enlistment and venture forward as settlers of the New West. Still others choose to return from whence they came. A number did not last long enough to satisfy their commitment. Many deserted during the first three years and numerous others were dismissed for all manner of disciplinary infractions. Drinking and gambling were rampant. Some died from a variety of maladies and accidents, however none of the originals died as a result of hostile action in the first three years.⁹

For all their warts and imperfections, the 'Originals' were a proud lot of hard boiled and hardworking men, who overcame great adversity to carry forward Macdonald's vision. They laid the fabric for the Force which was to develop over the next century. It is that legacy which binds them to those who serve today, and to the very heart and soul of Canada.

⁸Macleod became the second permanent Commissioner, upon the resignation of Colonel French.

⁹The Force began a system of numbering for its non-commissioned officers and men shortly after its establishment. This Original Series of numbers was actually two series, one maintained at the Comptroller's office in Ottawa and the other by the Commissioner. The Force was renumbered late in the 1870s, with numbers being re-issued to those still serving. These New Series numbers have continued in sequence to the present, however have led to great confusion as some of the original members received three different numbers and many with New Series numbers below 300 did not join until long after the March West.

Morrison Productions, who graciously donated his talent and time to complete this important video. As well, the Commanding Officer "E" Division, along with other serving members, will join us and it is the intent to distribute the video, not only to the RCMP, but other agencies throughout Canada in order to promote bone marrow/stem cell donation awareness. On October 23, Veterans attended Surrey Detachment in honour of RCMP Veteran Robert Gordon Teather (1947-2004). An October 23, 2018 Facebook post by Surrey Detachment states, "The late Cpl Bob Teather was a Surrey RCMP officer and one of the founding members of the "E" Division Dive Team. In September 1981, he rescued two fishermen trapped in an overturned hull of a boat. For his efforts, he was awarded the Cross of Valour, the highest ranking of Canadian Bravery Decorations. Canada's highest award for bravery, for the rescue. Today, we dedicated the Teather Training Room at Surrey Detachment in his name. His wife, the RCMP Veterans' Association and his colleagues were present." It was an honour for the Vancouver Division to support and assist (in small ways) with the planning of this dedication. And thanks to Surrey Detachment for their continued support of our Veterans.

As you know this November 11th will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Armistice and many RCMP Veterans will be attending parades in honour of the contributions and sacrifices of fallen Veterans. Vancouver Division Veterans will also be attending a "Tribute to Veterans" at Elgin Park Secondary School, South Surrey, which is being held on November 8th. They will be accompanied by several WWII Veterans and a Legion Piper. Thanks goes out to all our Veterans who will be attending the many functions being held to honour this day of memorial.

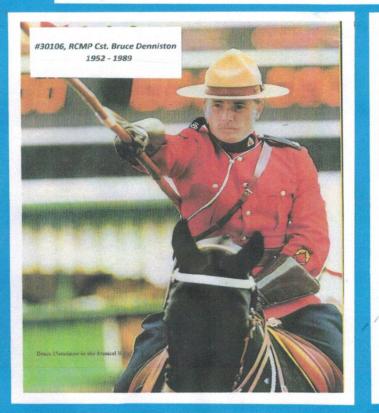

In closing, an Open House is being planned for the Vancouver Division new RCMP Veterans' office located in the main building at Surrey Detachment. The Open House will be held on Thursday, November 22, 2018 from 11:00 am to 3:00 pm. Division members are welcome to attend and view "the new digs" but please ensure that you confirm you will be attending by replying to rcmpvavancouver@gmail.com.

Did you know Vancouver Division supports BC Guide Dogs? Treasurer, Rupert Bullock, and his wife, Bev, have been training dogs for BC Guide Dogs for quite some time and below is an email excerpt from Rupert with a picture of BC Guide Dog prospect Maggie. Rupert and Bev's dog, Max, has certainly been a busy fella!

"Maggie is one of the puppies that Vancouver Division sponsors. Maggie refers to Max as being her Dad. Max is the dog that Bev and I raised and trained from a little pup (on behalf of BC Guide Dogs). He is seven years old. To date he has Fathered 96 pups around the world. He is patiently waiting for another female to come into heat to do his thing and hopefully this will put his production over 100., I don't know if that will be a record, but it has to be close."
